Kosovorotka: history

The first evidence of the Russian Kosovorotka refers to the annals of XII century, which relate to the ancient Suzdal of the time of the Holy Prince Andrei Bogolyubsky (1111 - 1174). The Grand Duke was the ruler of Vladimir Suzdal Rus, the first Russian Autocrat, in whom political and the economic center of Ancient Russia moved from the South-West to the North-East.

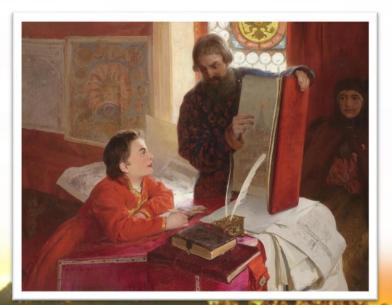

For centuries, the braid was the most common among Russian people's male attire, which has an inter-tabular character: peasants, and city dwellers, nobles and tsars.

July 12 - Day of the Apostles Peter and Paul – THE PROPOSED DAY OF ROSOVOROTKA CELEBRATION

Petrov Day in Russian folklore was called the "top" of summer. On this day, the Petrov Fasting ended and the haymaking season began.

Haymaking usually lasted two to three weeks and was considered in a Russian village difficult but festive at times: both women and men dressed for haymaking holiday clothes, after work arranged round dances, games and dances.

Since ancient times on this day, parents gifted their an adult son with a new kosovorotka in which he went into the world as full-grown adults and hard worker.

ROSOVOROTKA DAY LOGO

The logo is based on the idea of the graceful trinity of "Sun of Light", giving from the azure height to the universe, its warmth and energy

"Mothers of the Earth", as the mother-nurse of the Russian people, the source of spiritual and material grace, as well as the traditional dress of the Russian people "Kosovorotka", as symbol of masculinity and hard work.

This idea describes one of the oldest bonds of the archetype of Russian Man as a great worker devoted to his historical fate as the Creator and Defender of the Russian State.
